

JULIA DEAN.

A number of prominent men have consented to be sold as slaves at the auction block, and several others who have not consented will be forced to endure the same fate. There will be a number of musical specialties. Besides those furnished by the principals, there will be songs by the Imperial and Apollo Quartettes, solos by Messrs. Pyper and Nieman, a trick banjo performance by Mr. Harper; and last, but not least, music by the Pickaninny Band and the Pickaninny Mandolin Club. The last named is composed of pupils of Prof. Theodore Best.

The fun will begin before the curtain rises, and will last until the performance is over.

Dean Henry Lawrence Southwick, under the chaperonage of the Y. M. C. A., gave some rather remarkable Shakespearean readings during the week at the Theatre. The readings were remarkable for something quite a long way removed from excellence, and the audience which listened to the Dean was unenthusiastic and small. The performance could scarcely be referred to as a financial or any other variety of success.

Edwin Lemare's musical festival at the First Congregational church was a rarely entertaining event for local music lovers. Mr. Lemare showed a truly wonderful mastery of the organ, and some of his own compositions were received with especial favor.

"Hazel Kirke," of sainted memory, drew some fair-sized audiences to the Grand during the week.

Before "Soldiers of Fortune" was published in 1897, its author was known as R. H. Davis, newspaper reporter, maker of short stories and promising youth. After the book had left the press he became a popular hero and since then remained one. Today he is Richard Harding Davis, novelist, war correspondent, journalist, globe-trotter, man of the world and observer of humanity in general. It is Augustus Thomas' stage version of this successful story which has been elected by Henry by Harris for Robert Edeson's starring tour.
